Access to this collection is at the discretion of the Otis Historical Archives and material contained within the records may be subject to review before access is granted.

Series/Scope and Content Note: While photography had become a useful tool by the time of the Civil War, the government did not yet have a photographic corps; it did have trained artists already in the Army. Army Medical Museum Curator John Brinton gathered these artists on his staff in Washington. He had them enlisted as hospital stewards and assigned to duty in the Surgeon General's office. Wartime urgency made photographic production impractical in surgical manuals produced for the government; illustrations offered an invaluable alternative. Given the number of casualties during the war, both the Confederacy and the Union needed to educate as many doctors as possible in the skills of military medicine. Illustrations demonstrated key facets of military medicine. Medical illustrations could display wounds commonly encountered but rarely seen by civilian practitioners, and were used to demonstrate surgical procedures and the reasons for procedures. The medical illustrations in this collection were primarily created by Museum staff during the Civil War.

Many of the illustrations in this collection also subsequently appeared in the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion. Compiling and publishing the massive volumes of the MSHWR was an integral part of the Museum operation and took 23 years to complete. Each of the six "parts" of the two "volumes" averaged nearly 1,000 quarto pages of text, with an average of some 40 full-page plates made mostly from illustrations, many in color, plus scores of black and white wood cuts. In order for photographs to be included in large edition books like these, they had to be printed by hand from a glass negative and glued in every single copy of the book. Illustrations could be printed from lithographic plates in color and bound into the book as any other printed page would be. Engravings from the MSHWR thus played a critically important role in illustrating the lessons learned on battlefields.

The majority of the illustrations in this collection are watercolor paintings, but there are also oil paintings, pencil sketches, and lithographic proofs and prints. Included are professional artists Hermann Faber and Edward Stauch along with amateurs such as William Schultze, Peter Baumgras, and others. This finding aid also includes information about many of the soldiers depicted in the illustrations.

Research on the lives of these soldiers was done at the National Archives. Some of this information is included in Oversized Box 005.

For additional information on the MSHWR and the use of medical illustrations, see: Robert S. Henry, The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology: Its First Century, 1862-1962 (Washington, DC: Office of the Surgeon General, Department of the Army: 1964); and J.T.H. Connor and Michael G. Rhode, "Shooting Soldiers: Civil War Medical Images, Memory, and Identity in America," Invisible Culture: An Electronic Journal for Visual Culture 5 (2003). The MSHWR was originally published by the Army Medical Museum and has been reprinted in 15 volumes as: United States Army Surgeon General's Office, The Medical and Surgical History of the Civil War (Wilmington, NC: Broadfoot Publishing Company, 1990).
